TASK's TECH Connection - A Safe Space for Practicing Social Skills

By Elena Arrojo, Manager, Communications and Development

Positive social interaction is a common challenge for people with autism. While someone with autism may want to interact socially with others, they often don't know how or may feel overwhelmed. But social interaction is a critical life skill. Even mild problems with communication can lead to relationship problems at school and work. However, from basic skills to more sophisticated interactions, social interaction can be improved with training and practice.

TASK's TECH Connection program provides valuable opportunities for young people (ages twelve and older) to practice these communication, social and life skills. The group, which is run by Laura Martinez, TASK's Assistive Technology Program Manager, and Bernadette Kennard, a Speech-Language Pathologist, meets monthly at TASK's Orange County office in Anaheim. Each session introduces participants to a life skills topic, then they pair off to practice social skills and conversation under the guidance of parents and TASK staff. Topics include: social communication, healthy habits, safety, community skills, listening skills, figurative speech, disaster preparedness, money skills, setting personal boundaries and more. Interactive games and iPad applications help reinforce the lessons.

TASK client Diane Dantas has been bringing her two sons, Sean and Ian, to TECH Connection for the past four years. "Both boys benefit," says Dantas. "They learn life skills like grooming and personal hygiene, social boundaries, and safety delivered in an entertaining and interactive way and at a level that's appropriate for each of them." One son is considered moderately autistic and is largely nonverbal while the other has Asperger syndrome and benefits from practicing appropriate social responses, formulating questions, listening, and generating logical responses.

"Because Sean and Ian were at school all day, I didn't have the chance to observe how they interacted with their peers," says Dantas. Because TECH Connection requires parent participation, she can watch them converse with others and see how they do. It's often hard for kids with autism to start a conversation. TECH Connection provides a monthly theme, which creates some structure for conversation. Repetition helps participants remember and hone skills.

"TECH Connection is a safe space for learning and practicing social skills," says Dantas. "If they make a social mistake, it's ok. Everyone there understands and is supportive. It's a good place to test out their [conversational] material. I don't have to explain the quirks and disabilities when my kids do odd things, because everyone gets it." Through the program, Dantas and her kids have met and befriended other kids and parents, whom they now see at outside community events.

"I've observed growth in both boys." says Dantas. "Ian takes more time now to think out answers, remembering people's names and to say 'hello.' Sean looks forward to attending TECH Connection and wants to be there. Both interact more now with their teammates." Dantas keeps her sons active in all kinds of activities, especially sports, but sports are competitive in nature and don't provide the same opportunities for practicing conversation skills. "I don't know of another activity like this one," says Dantas. "Everyone needs a place where they're comfortable, where they belong. We enjoy going!"

Sean Dantas in a TECH Connection session.
